To whom it may concern :

This letter concerns itself with Geordie Jay, whom I've known both personally and professionally for the past two years.

Our professional contact has been through his work on my computers -- the switch from Windows to Mac and then the installation of a series of programs. It has been more than that, though. He has come to know me and my work (now that I have retired from my businesses, I am a writer, producing the history of my family, among other things) and has researched, recommended, installed and trained me in a number of programs - writing, website building and lots of other things.

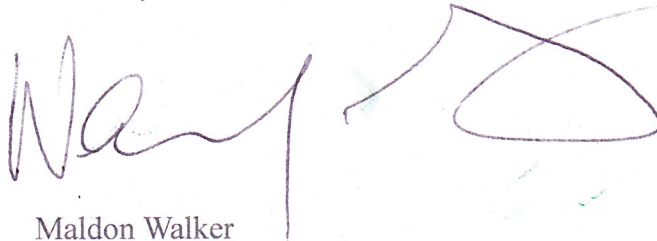

He is always available, returns calls promptly, shows a quick grasp of issues, arrives on time and is very thorough in all that he does. I rely on him heavily.

From a personal perspective, I have come to treat him almost as a grandson. We have long talks over lunches and dinners. He is interested in everything, including investment, company structures, relationships and philosophies and my "life" experiences.

He will no doubt tell you about his experiences in Europe and his fluency in German and French. This in itself is unusual in someone so young. In fact, my wife had been learning French for years and Geordie now coaches her.

In short, Geordie is a fine young man. I wish Australia had more like him.

Sincerely
